STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The significance of Berea College in the history of black education is that it was the first college established in the United States for the specific purpose of educating black and white together. Berea, which traces its beginnings to 1855, was not the first college to admit blacks nor was it the first school established to offer Afro-Americans access to higher education. Schools like Cheyney and Lincoln in Pennsylvania and Wilberforce in Ohio had been established either as Negro Colleges or as schools that would admit blacks. Berea, however, was the first school at which integration of the races was a specific reason for establishing the school. As Berea's founder John G. Fee informed a friend in 1855, "We eventually look to a college giving an education to all colors, classes, cheap and thorough."

Berea's history begins in 1855 when John Fee, an ordained minister and an agent of the American Missionary Association, opened a small elementary school in a church built on a ridge in southern Madison County, Kentucky. Fee named the location of his church and school Berea after a biblical town where men were opened minded. Racial tolerance is implicit in Berea's name. Fee, a native Kentuckian, had returned to the western, non-slaveholding part of his home State in 1853 at the urging of Cassius M. Clay. Clay, who had been impressed by a pamphlet Fee had written entitled Antislayery Manual, urged Fee to spread the abolitionist cause among the people of western Kentucky. By 1855 Fee had established a reputation as a staunch abolitionist. As a result his church and school had become a hated symbol to pro-slavery forces. Between 1855 and 1859 Fee and his friend J. A. R. Rogers, an Oberlin graduate and fellow minster who had come to Berea to help Fee, struggled to keep the school alive. Their lives were often threatened, but they continued their crusade. In 1859 Fee, Rogers, and others drew up a constitution for To this day the school is guided by the fundamentals of this Berea College. constitution, which reads in part,

The purpose of the College shall be to furnish the facilities for a thorough education to all persons of good moral character, at the least possible expense, and all the inducements and facilities for manual labor which can reasonably be supplied by the Board of Trustees shall be offered...This college shall be under an influence strictly Christian, and as such opposed to sectarianism, slaveholding, caste, and every other institution or practice.

Shortly after Berea's constitution was written, John Brown raided Harper's Ferry. Throughout the South the action provoked a wave of fear and reprisal. In December 1859 a group of some 65 armed men rode into Berea and informed Fee and Rogers that they had ten days to leave the State. When the governor refused to provide protection, they packed and left.

Fee spent the war years raising money for the future college. No sooner were the guns silent than Fee returned to Kentucky and reopened the school. The American Missionary Association provided the necessary financial support. During the school year 1866-67 one hundred and eighty seven students attended the elementary classes. Ninety six were black and ninety one were white. The first college class registered in 1869, the same year Rev. E. Henry Fairchild, another Oberlin product, became Berea's first president.

Between 1869 and 1904 Berea put into practice the educational ambitions of its founders. Berea grew as a fully integrated college with a black population of from one third to one half of the student body. A work-study progam was established to help students finance their own education as well as to teach them the rewards of labor and craftmanship. Through the work-study program an educational opportunity was provided for the usually economically disadvantaged youth of the Appliachian region. Until 1904 Berea remained true to the motto John G. Fee had given it. The motto reflected the educational philosophy of the American Missionary Association, "God has made of one blood all nations of men."

In 1904 Jim Crow, that symbol of instituionalized racism, was spreading throughout the southern and border States. Laws calling for the strict segregation of the races issued from every State legislature. Kentucky was not immune. In 1904 the State legislature passed a law stipulating that blacks and whites could not be taught in the same classroom. Although the law applied to all schools, it was aimed specifically at Berea. For four years Berea and its supporters fought the law in the courts. In the process they assembled a wealth of documentation demonstrating that integration did not play a role in academic achievement and that integration had many social benefits in promoting better understanding between the races. The fight was lost. (The role of Berea's president at the time, William Frost, is a subject of controversey.) In 1908 the United States Supreme Court, which only twelve years previously had handed down its famous separate but equal decision in Plessy v. Ferguson, ruled that, since Berea was a private organization incorporated by the State of Kentucky, the State had the right to regulate it according to State laws. The Supreme Court sidestepped the specific issue of the constitutionality of racial segregation in education, an issue that would not be fully decided for almost another fifty years when a carefully selected little girl named Brown would decide to attend an all white school in Topeka, Kansas. Berea College v. Commonwealth of Kentucky (211 U.S. 45) became a landmark case in segregations's tortured constitutional history.

Beginning in 1904 Berea segregated. Part of the school's endowment and a portion of its operating funds were used to establish an all black school at Lincoln, Kentucky. The country's first attempt at fully integrated higher education came to an end.
